From design degree to design employment

Your academic reward for three years of hard work and determination is a degree certificate that helps you to get 'a foot in the door' of the design industry. Although this piece of paper is a requirement and necessity for many employers, what they really want to see is evidence of your skills as a designer. This doesn't only include technical proficiency; they also want to see how you think, how inventive you are, how your work stands apart from others, and how interesting you are as a unique individual. Your work should speak for you in terms of your passions, focus and career ambitions. Our graphic design graduates work for a wide range of agencies, businesses, and organisations around the world. Here is just a small sample of their individual successes.

Drina Murphy

Freelance Graphic
Designer

“ Having worked as a graphic designer in the corporate sector, I quickly realised that it wasn't for me. Although I enjoyed aspects of the position, it wasn't diverse enough and didn't really stretch my creative skills. Taking the plunge and becoming a freelancer is one of the best things I have ever done. I now have the best of both worlds. I have a diverse array of clients ranging from corporate businesses to sole traders. I like to provide added value by way of a marketing background so I can create graphics and images that connect with a clients target audience and bring copywriting skills that compel readers to take action ”
